Emma

7:50 a.m.

I'm on the train going to school. But it has stopped for more than 10 minutes without any announcement. I'm sure I will be late for my 1st class! Are you in school now?

Riko

7:53 a.m.

Are you OK? I'm already in school. It's raining so heavily this morning, and I got so wet when I came to school. I will tell Mr. Oda you may be late for his class.

Emma

7:56 a.m.

Thank you. Now the announcement is saying there was a traffic accident near South Park Station and some trains were delayed* because of it.

Riko

8:02 a.m.

That's too bad. I'm afraid some of our classmates will also be late for school because of the same accident. Is there anything I can do for you?

Emma

8:05 a.m.

Yes, please. Do you have the memo of today's student council* meeting? I think I left it at home. If you have it, can you take a photo and send it to me now?

Riko

8:07 a.m.

Sorry, I forgot to bring it to school, but I remember the meeting will start in Room A at 4:20. Don't forget to hand in next month's schedule to Mr. Oda by lunch time!

Emma

8:10 a.m.

Thanks a lot. Now the train is moving slowly, I may get to school before the class! See you soon!

Riko

8:12 a.m.

It's still raining. Watch your step! See you!

Green Sea Turtle

Have you ever seen green sea turtles? They are large turtles living in the sea. The shell* of the turtle is usually brown or green color. People can find them at coastlines of more than 80 countries including Japan. The largest population sites are in Costa Rica and Australia.

Like other turtles, green sea turtles can travel long distances between the places, because they have strong flippers* that help them swim quickly in the water. Green sea turtles spend most their lives under water. When they are active, they swim underwater for some minutes, and then come up to the surface of water to breathe air for several seconds.

Female green sea turtles leave the water to lay* eggs on the beach. They choose the same beach as they were born. A female green turtle digs out a small hole on the sand with her flippers and lays* about 100 eggs. Then she covers the eggs with sand and returns to the sea. After about two months, the baby turtles break their eggshells*. For the first few years, most baby turtles eat plankton floating in the water. As they grow older, they start to eat seagrass at coast areas. It is said that the green grass makes the turtles body color olive green.

There are many threats to green sea turtles in the sea, such as birds, crabs and large size whales. However, the biggest threats are humans. Some turtles are caught in fishing nets, others are killed by boat propellers. The water and sand in their living area are polluted by human activity.

Green sea turtles are a key species to understand the marine* environment. The lives of green sea turtles are strongly related to the other marine animals and plants, scientists say. When green sea turtles are not living healthily*, we can understand that the marine environment is getting worse. The number of green sea turtles directly shows how human activity impacts the marine ecosystem.
